■■ The Haunted House Metaphor – by EnidKimberly

Imagine someone’s soul is stuck in a haunted house. They don’t know how to get out. They’re trapp

You — the loved one — come to the window. You find them crying and weeping, saying: 'My soul is

You cry. You say 'I’m sorry.' You hug them. Then… you leave.

Another loved one comes and says: 'What happened? Why did your soul get here? You had no pro
The next day, you return and say: 'Come on, let’s go play.'

They smile. Pretend. Maybe even follow you outside. But the moment you walk away again, they’re

■ This is the truth:
You didn’t save them. You offered sympathy — your version of comfort. You didn’t dive in. You didn

You cried, but you didn’t understand. You hugged, but you didn’t hear. You invited them to play… w

■ Advice!
The victim had not lost intelligence at this point. They haven’t forgotten what to do. Telling them wh

Your advice and quick visit? It wasn’t help.

■ Bring the torch if you care. Give a rope. Let’s pull together!

■ The Hidden Pain of the Victim:
'I smiled… to make you feel better. But I died a little more inside… trying to please you.'

■ And Then the Day Comes:
They completely shut down.

You say: 'But I said sorry.'
'I cried with you.'
'We even played together.'

■ But the truth is:
You offered what you wanted to give — not what they needed.
And now, you think they gave up. But really… they just couldn’t pretend anymore.

■ Empathy is This:
You put on their shoes. You step inside the haunted house. You become them, even just for a day.

And suddenly, you feel the entire truth — without needing them to explain it.

And that’s when you're ready to help.

■ Enid’s Final Line (Quote to Feature Bold on Posters):
“They didn’t give up. They gave in — to the exhaustion of pretending.”